Home and Garden: DAYBREAK'S UNIQUE STYLE

To establish what types of neighborhoods, dwellings, yards, and open spaces work best for different groups, Daybreak hired a marketing company that came up with 63 psychographic profiles for prospective residents, ranging from “young professionals with or without children, ages 25-34” to “empty nesters, ages 55-64.”

the European Romantic style house. Neighborhood designs also are geared toward particular psychographic profiles. In the Garden Park neighborhood, designed for people 55 and over, front yards are built with a maintenance-free lifestyle in mind. Here, seniors can choose from four varieties of the new American Lawn theme, which all come with the archetypical white picket fence: Picket Lawn, Picket Shrub, Lawn Shrub, and Picket Perennial. Other communities at Daybreak are allowed to have only wrought iron fences.

Most of the houses are in styles such as Victorian, Arts and Crafts, and Colonial Revival. And although homeowners are in charge of designing their backyards, front yards come in three basic plans. One plan is the Great Basin Prairie Style, which is based on traditional Midwestern prairie landscape architecture, developed in the 1800s by Jens Jensen and OC Simonds. This style emphasizes open flowing lawns and ordered arrangements of plantings adjacent to the house.

Another is the Utah Cottage Garden, inspired by the gardens of the early Mormon settlers in Utah Valley, which drew upon 19th-century British landscape architecture traditions. Within a limited amount of lawn, the Utah Cottage garden is dense and lush, and it features both edible and horticultural species. Then there is the New American Lawn, which is oriented around a manicured lawn with formal plantings at its boundaries. Grade changes in the lawn and masonry walls form a drainage system that diverts water away from the house.

Daybreak's highly detailed pattern book instructs Daybreak's contractors on how to match different styles of landscape architecture for front yards with different styles of houses. So, for example, the Utah Cottage Garden is designed for either the Daybreak Victorian or
